This Is What Happens When You Use Gold-Infused Skin Care Products for a Week

Couldn't get much more luxe than this, huh?

Walk into the InStyle beauty closet and you'll see shelves full of skin care products spiked with exotic ingredients like diamonds and dead sea minerals. And lately, I've noticed a new trend in our stock: gold infused in everything from eye creams to cleansers.

Intrigued, I asked a dermatologist about the potential benefits of this gleaming new addition: "Gold is used as an anti-aging ingredient, as it can help reduce inflammation, which is a cause of acne and hyper pigmentation," explained Dr. Paul Jarrod Frank, an N.Y.C.-based cosmetic dermatologist. "When applied topically, it also helps brighten the skin."

With that in mind, I decided to conduct a little experiment: I swapped all of my regular skincare products for gold-infused replacements and used them exclusively for one week. Here, a look at my routine:

The Arsenal

Peter Thomas Roth 24K Pure Luxury Cleansing Butter (sephora.com; $55) worked like an absolute dream. Unlike other cleansing balms I've tried, this stuff was truly, well, buttery, and spread easily on my face. While it isn't gold-infused, the konjac sponge that comes with it was a welcome bonus—it made the whole process unmessy and totally enjoyable.

Tatcha Deep Hydration Firming Serum (tatcha.com; $95) was a product already in my stash. The gold-flecked, smooth-as-silk formula always leaves my skin looking extra luminous.

Chantecaille Nano Gold Energizing Eye Cream (nordstrom.com; $265) delivers 24K gold to a cellular level, where its anti-inflammatory benefits can best target eye-related issues like puffiness. (I was especially grateful for this come Monday morning.)

Orogold 24K Multi-Vitamin Day Moisturizer (rogoldcosmetics.com; $178) is a lightweight daily face cream formulated with a bevy of vitamins and antioxidants, the latter of which quash cell-damaging free radicals. The hygienic—and convenient—push-button dispenser was also a plus.

Carita Paris Progressif Anti-Age Global Perfect Cream Trio of Gold (dermstore.com; $390) was my nighttime go-to as it delivers a heavier dose of moisture. By far the priciest item I tried, it was also the most nourishing: My seasonally dry skin drank up this firming blend of three different types of gold.

In addition to the steps above, I applied two gold-infused masks over the course of my trial: Peter Thomas Roth 24K Gold Mask Pure Luxury Lift & Firm Mask (sephora.com; $80) and Orogold 24K Gold Vitamin C Mask (oro-gold.com; $218). Both promised lifting with the added bonus of hydrating skin; and I must say, both delivered. Instagram addicts, take note: Peter Thomas Roth's visibly gold formula makes for a highly-"likeable" selfie.

The Verdict

After seven days of using gold-infused products, I do feel like my skin looks more luminous than before. Most notably, the hyperpigmentation around my nose seems to have diminished, a benefit that Dr. Frank predicted. And, in my mind, results after only a week means these products all earn a gold star.
